The iOS maps app is great for getting me to the proper GPS point for the trailheads. The trouble is the return trip: in the remote areas I hike, it's unlikely that I'll have data service when it comes time to head home. No data service = no navigation. Having a USA road atlas in the car is great for getting from state to state or city to city, but it does you no good on small country roads. The scale of this map, however, does let you see those smaller roads. I was recently out in the country on a little one lane dirt trail that amazingly enough was labeled as a road and was in this book. It was nice to be able to plan out a way to cut diagonally across the county to get where I needed to go instead of back tracking to a major route.
